Pronoun

A pronoun is used as a substitute for a noun or a noun phrase, e.g.

He was upstairs. Did you see that?
Anything can happen now. It's lovely weather.

Using a pronoun often avoids repetition, e.g.

I found Jim—he was upstairs.
(instead of I found Jim—Jim was upstairs.)

Where are your keys?—I've got them.
(instead of Where are your keys?—I've got my keys.)

Pronouns are the only words in English which have different forms when used as the subject (I, we, he, she, etc.) and as the object (me, us, him, her, etc.).

Relative clause

A relative clause is a subordinate clause used to add to the meaning of a noun. A relative clause is usually introduced by a relative pronoun (who, which, that).

Restrictive relative clauses are distinguished from non-restrictive relative clauses by punctuation. A non-restrictive relative clause has commas round it, e.g.

Please approach any member of our staff, who will be pleased to help, and discuss your needs.

The shopkeeper who left the commas out turned this into a restrictive relative clause, implying that there were other members of staff who would not be pleased to help!

The relative pronoun whom (the objective case of who) is now used only in formal writing.

The person whom he hit was a policeman. (formal)
The person who he hit was a policeman. (less formal)

The relative pronoun may be omitted if it is the object of the relative clause:

The person he hit was a policeman.

Sentence

A sentence is the basic unit of language in use and expresses a complete thought. There are three types of sentence, each starting with a capital letter, and each normally ending with a full stop, a question mark, or an exclamation mark:

Statement:	You're happy.
Question:	Is it raining?
Exclamation:	I wouldn't have believed it!

A sentence, especially a statement, often has no punctuation at the end in a public notice, a newspaper headline, or a legal document, e.g.

Government cuts public spending

A sentence normally contains a subject and a verb, but may not, e.g.

What a mess! Where? In the sink.
